Scope of Practice Questions:             <ol style="list-style-type: none"> <li>1. For the practice of IASTM/ Gua Sha/ Cupping, is it sufficient for a licensed chiropractor to pursue continued education courses, engage in peer learning through demonstrations, and study relevant research to meet the Board's standards for education and training? Or is it a requirement to obtain specific certification from recognized organizations (e.g., Graston, HawkGrips) before a licensee is authorized to perform these techniques on patients?</li> <li>2. In cases where a licensee holds current certifications in methodologies such as Graston and Astym, does the Board permit such an individual to impart training to others within their professional scope, albeit not for certification purposes? For example, can a chiropractor certified in the Graston technique legally instruct a massage therapist or athletic trainer (soft tissue mobilization is also in their scope of practice) in the application of this method, solely to enhance the latter's skill set or for demonstration purposes, without issuing formal certification? To be specific, can a chiropractor perform a small demonstration of Astym (5-10 minutes) to another professional for education and not certification purposes?</li> </ol> </li> <li>8.
